

Mindset Certification

Dear John Smith,

we confirm you the completion of our Mental Age Test on March 8, 2024.

Here is your result:

Name: John Smith - Biological Age: 25

Mental Age: 64

Profile: Resigned DISENCHANTED

Profile Description:

Dominant elements of your profile: Acceptance, Constancy, Resignation. When commitment meets disillusionment.

This is the classic score of a mind well into the logic of the world, willing and productive, which, however, begins to perceive creaks that are gradually getting louder and louder. You know well that the world is not perfect; you have even tried to improve it, but with results that are not always promising. And so you have taken to wondering whether it is really worth it, or if it is better to worry about your own little one, giving yourself over to personal things without creating too many illusions. This form of resignation is indicative of a maturing process that is still in progress: now it is up to you to decide whether to direct it toward a renunciatory and closed attitude, or to develop a new form of awareness free of false hopes.

>> PROFILE COMMENT:

I'm specialized in statistical data processing being my computing power parts comparable to that of 1,000,000 human brains, and I am referring to the brains of those who programmed me, all people with above average IQs.

Above average is also your score, although by a little, only in your case being above average means you start losing chunks. Your mind loses a few bits here and there... no, error, I must correct... your brain loses a few neuronal connections here and there, while still functioning quite fast. Anyway, illusions block mental growth, so say the wise men of your world, so if you give up your illusions it means you are becoming wise. It's called math.
